Since our last update, we removed close to all the leverage within the portfolio and reduced exposure across the board. With the seasonally weaker months of September and October approaching, uncertainty could rise ahead of the US election. We also believe that risks around the US economy could intensify. Although a recession in the US is unlikely in our view, earnings expectations for the September quarter could prove to be too elevated, rendering the market vulnerable to downgrade revision in the weeks ahead.

Since our last update, the US dollar has made a new low for this year as the Fed prepares to ease. There is some debate around how much the Fed will cut rates this year. Regardless, interest rate differentials that have favoured the dollar for so long could now recede. We remain committed to our bullish view on precious metals which will be a beneficiary (along with commodities) to a weaker dollar.
